Torrent your files!Q: What best practices exist for using multiple static web servers? I have a series of web applications that are hosted on a single, physical server with 4 GB of memory. I am interested in the best way to improve response time for the site. I am looking at purchasing more RAM, buying a couple of servers with each hosting 1 app, and moving the apps onto separate servers. Is it possible to run a web server that's not Apache on the same computer (Windows or Linux) as a web server that's Apache? If so, would this be a performance problem? What about the possibility of using both on the same server? A: First of all, don't worry about Apache vs. Nginx vs. Unicorn vs. Varnish vs. Ligato. Just worry about keeping your apps, virtual memory, and data on separate servers. If you use different VMs for different app servers, you'll be much better off. You can scale each app server up and down independently without affecting other apps. Scale your database servers down and up independently. Scale your file servers down and up independently. Scale your memory/processor
