Mouse sperm morphology has been studied by various methods, most of them based on the differential staining of the DNA of the head and the tail. Differences in the parameters measured can be due to a difference in the head size and in the morphology of the flagellum. More recent techniques with staining of the inclusions found in the sperm head have shown that the DNA of the sperm head is in the regions devoid of inclusions and the head shape is unaffected. The DNA staining methods do not distinguish between sperm with normal and abnormal morphology and it has been suggested that the DNA of the head is absent from the abnormal sperm. The production of these sperm may be due to the presence of sperm heads that have undergone a death process. This was studied by transmission electron microscopy and the direct observation of the cells by phase contrast microscopy and by the cytophotometry of cells in
