Microbiologically induced activation of factor Va: a novel mechanism of thrombin generation. During the past decade, our laboratory has demonstrated that activated factor Va (fVa) is recognized by distinct complement (C) receptors (CRs) and is functionally engaged in the activation of factor X (FX). We have shown that membrane-bound FV can activate FX in an FX-independent manner, particularly under conditions in which both surfaces of the fV-FX complex are covered with C, thereby resembling a surface-bound C activation complex. Here, we report that bacterial lipopolysaccharides (LPS) do not activate FX directly via fV; however, LPS activate FX through fV which is held in solution by microorganisms. This fV-mediated activation of FX results from a sequence of events that involves activation of cofactor FVa and initiation of fX by a cell-associated thrombin. The identified phenomenon is called microbiologically induced activation of cofactor-dependent factor X (FOCIAX). Physiologic fX activation is postulated to occur in vivo under conditions of intravascular or extravascular clearance of cellular FV fragments. Thus, in this report, we extend our mechanistic studies of FOCIAX and demonstrate that the microbe-associated host response to bacteria results in a surface-bound fV-FX activation complex.
