Anthropomorphism and Objectification: Intimate Partners' Attitudes to Differentiated Body Parts.

Intimate partner violence is a serious global public health issue. A large body of research has focused on the adverse effects on women's health, and relatively little is known about how intimate partners' attitudinal beliefs and behavior impact women's health. This study considers the effects of anthropomorphism and objectification on intimate partners' attitudes toward women's body parts. In particular, we investigate how objectification and anthropomorphism may explain racial differences in intimate partners' attitudes, using a sample of 517 men and women from the USA and Indonesia. We find that objectification has a greater impact on intimate partners' attitudes towards Asians than Americans.

Analyses show that, compared to Americans, Indonesian participants hold a more pronounced anthropomorphic view of Asians' body parts. This study contributes to the literature on intimate partner violence by introducing the idea that intimate partners' attitudes are shaped by objectification, and that these attitudes may differ cross-culturally.Q:

Best Of Cheese Excavator Phil Stearns for LA Weekly The old adage of "less is more" certainly doesn't apply to food. Ironic, then, that a cheese-grinding machine made of aluminum is just what my husband (a Seattle native and die-hard PNW sports fan) asked for at Christmas when we found ourselves in need of a cutting board for our kitchen's tiny stock of European cheeses
