Molecular dynamics simulations of the intrinsic dynamics of alanine dipeptides in aqueous solution. The intrinsic dynamics of the solute in aqueous solution are explored using molecular dynamics (MD) simulations and quantum mechanics (QM) calculations. MD simulations of three C(alpha) atoms of alanine-based peptides in water models with different level of details and with different "smearing" of the solvent properties were performed. All-atom MD with explicit solvent showed good correlation with experimental data in the case of the amide-I vibration which is the most sensitive to the solvent. The simulations of an alanine dipeptide in water was performed at the MP2 level of QM (full system) and also with the six different CASSCF water models with different level of details. The anharmonicities of the molecules with each water model is discussed. The QM contribution to the total solute-water interaction energy is the main source of intramolecular anharmonicities. #define GET_A_CALLBACK(name) \ void name (
