Pros The simple interface and graphic tools help people who know nothing about the software to edit photos and other graphics. Some of the most important features are included in the free version, such as undo, redo, and the High Dynamic Range (HDR) function. The non-destructive editing and tools allow for the quick and easy editing of graphics and photos. The user interface uses a visual metaphor and teaches people how to use the tools. Accidents can happen, and Photoshop Elements offers the users many safety nets to prevent mistakes. Photoshop Elements is the best choice for beginners who want a free, simple photo editor. Cons Even in the free version, only limited features are included and some of the big features, such as background replacement, are not included. Adobe is a proprietary software, and in the free version, it will stop the software from working if you make a modification to the software. So be careful what you do, or you may brick your computer. The image editor interface is as complicated as the professional version, and many of the features that are accessible to the user require a lot of advanced knowledge to access. It is possible to exceed your disk capacity if you have a large library of photos, and even though it is possible to delete a photo without losing its metadata, it is not possible to restore files with a corrupted file. The cloud option is only available for the advanced features and is only supported by paid members. This software is vulnerable to hijacking, if someone connects to the internet while you are using the software. It is not the perfect image editor for advanced users. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a system and method for automatically adjusting light filters used to adjust exposure and color balance during a single exposure. Description of the Related Art In high-speed photography, it is important to control the amount of light entering an image capturing device. Two types of light filters are typically used to control the amount of light entering the image capturing device. Light filters for controlling white balance are called neutral density filters and for controlling exposure control are called exposure filters. Conventional neutral density filters are usually manually adjusted during production and in the field. Some exposure filters are adjusted in a similarly manual way, but without the range of adjustment. With conventional neutral density filters, only one filter coefficient can be adjusted at a time. Hence, to adjust both the neutral density filter and the exposure filter, two times the amount of time is required. When manual adjustment is used, it is common to change two filters in succession, but the technicians generally manually set the two filters in succession rather than in parallel.First cut of the day was "You'll see when we're drinking." (c) ReTigerProductions, LLC It's either the most exciting news I've received in months or I'm an enormous idjit, but "Kat Von D is coming back," said Lakisha Moses, who shall henceforth be known as the meanest, most dedicated publicist in the entire industry. When pressed for further information, Moses added "Not only is she coming back but she's helping us all open up to the process we do in horror filmmaking and make a better film! It's very exciting." Cut to three days later: Moses phoned me to assure me that Kat was going to be helping someone who I had no idea she was associated with. This person shall henceforth be known as the "main star of the film" [sic]. Then Moses continued, "You'll see when we're drinking." Today brings a return to the drawing board for the film -- as in, no, actually, several, for "Splatter Your Cat" -- but "there's a lot of heavy lifting and re-doing going on," Moses says. "It's going to be night and day from what it was." From what I remember, the "Splatter Your Cat" script had been bouncing around in various writers' hands for several years (another, sadly, "spiritual" film called "Splatter was planned, I believe, but has not eventuated

Strange night in UConn front office A scuffle broke out between players and coaches in a basketball function in Storrs, Connecticut, Saturday night, after UConn officials refused to give a local college player a high five. Yahoo Sports reported that according to police documents obtained by Yahoo, after the players and coaches came to an agreement over the rule in dispute, the students walked off the court and began protesting, with a coach telling them to “get off the court,” and “get out of here.” The students responded by shouting and spitting on the officials, with a total of seven police officers on scene. One of the officials told officers he had asked the players to come to his office and discuss their issues with him, but they ignored him. According to the police reports, in the midst of the incident, a female official told the players to “get out of here” and two of the players then confronted a different female official, then “came in close proximity to her face and spit.” In the altercation that followed, the female official told police that she tried to avoid the spit by stepping back, but the male official came towards her to try to calm the players down. “This individual then immediately came in close proximity to her face and spit,” the official stated, according to the reports. Police found some of the players involved in the altercation intoxicated and took them into custody for disorderly conduct and public intoxication. One player, who was arrested, was allegedly found to be in possession of marijuana, according to the police documents. The two officers involved in the arrest were not named in the documents. The incident was largely over before the police arrived on the scene, and they only dispersed the players and coaches after getting an update about the incident from the UConn officials. “A coach was left bloodied in the back after the altercation. We are not releasing his identity or the name of his school at this time due to the nature of his injuries,” the documents stated. Players told Yahoo that the female official had been yelling
