Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to manually operable gun leveling devices, and more specifically to such a device utilizing gravity. 2. Description of the Prior Art Gun sights are usually mounted on the barrel of a gun. These sights are normally pivoted, so that the gun can be aimed either up or down. Thus, for example, in order to be able to aim the gun at a target located above the gun, the gun must be raised, and if the target is located below the gun, the gun must be lowered. There has not heretofore been provided a gun sighting device which is not dependent upon gravity for establishing the elevation of the gun. Such a device, however, would eliminate the need to use an elevation above and below a target in order to sight the gun accurately at the target. However, the present invention is not restricted to the use with shooting guns, and the invention could be used for sighting for any purposes in which an object needs to be leveled or adjusted to a certain height. For example, the invention could be used to level the hood of an automobile.Q: google

This may be related to the differential selection pressure in northern areas for the immune functions conferred by the K-hap and R2 allele, respectively. More recently, the K-hap and R2 alleles were used to indicate the selective benefits of carrying the K-hap or R2 allele in other species, including humans. Murine skeletal muscle denervation results in a loss of dihydropyridine receptor Ca^{2+} -channel function. The activities of L-type Ca^{2+} channels and $^{45}Ca^{2+}$ efflux from mouse diaphragm muscle were studied using whole cell and single channel patch clamp techniques after 4-5 days of denervation. The results showed that the dihydropyridine (DHP) agonist, BAY K8644, was unable to stimulate $^{45}Ca^{2+}$ efflux from denervated diaphragms. These data suggest that mouse muscle denervation results in a loss of DHP receptor function.
