Divi Rieksti [parodija].wmv.epub.A new protocol of the erythrocyte nitroprusside-adenosine triphosphatase assay is developed which is useful for the screening of certain drugs which inhibit the enzyme. The test procedure is simple, non-invasive, rapid, and can be used for the screening of large numbers of samples. We propose to develop and improve the method and to test the procedure on various drugs affecting the enzyme in both the liver and the red blood cell. The assay provides information about the functional activity of the red cell and cellular mechanisms of drug action. It may also provide a useful index of the cellular effects of new drugs.Circulatory effects of normobaric oxygen breathing. The effects of oxygen breathing on arterial blood pressure, forearm blood flow, transcutaneous oxygen tension, and subcutaneous oxygen tension were studied in six normal subjects under four different conditions. Subjects breathed under one of four conditions: (1) ambient air [control]; (2) 100% oxygen; (3) 15% oxygen in nitrogen; (4) 100% oxygen. After 30-min exposure to the oxygen breathing conditions, each subject's transcutaneous and subcutaneous oxygen tension was measured on the palm, forearm, and calf. Blood pressure and forearm blood flow were also measured throughout. Subjects rested for 10-min, then 20-min post-oxygen exposure. The results showed no change in arterial blood pressure from the control condition. The arterial oxygen tension was significantly decreased in the oxygen breathing conditions. The control subjects had a mean skin oxygen tension of 50 mmHg, compared with 30 and 50 mmHg on the forearm and hand, respectively, in the oxygen breathing conditions. The subcutaneous oxygen tension on the hand was decreased at 15 and 100% oxygen breathing, and was significantly increased at 15% oxygen in nitrogen. Forearm blood flow was increased at the low oxygen concentrations. There was no significant change in subcutaneous oxygen tension at the forearm. These findings indicate that oxygen breathing decreases subcutaneous oxygen tension and increases skin blood flow.Fox News has been forced to air a public service announcement for its website after a viewer complained about its misleading headlines
