As a toy example to illustrate how this could work, consider the following construction. Suppose that there is a list of different things, called objects, that can only have two different properties, being red or being green. The question is: what kind of property is being red or being green? Now suppose we were going to start by not really considering the properties at all, but only the objects that we call things - and we were going to characterize a thing as being a thing simply by stipulating that it is a thing, that it exists and that its existence is not dependent on us. Now suppose we were going to start by not considering what a thing is, but merely what it is like, by introducing a relation, call it being "like" that holds between a thing and things. But then we were going to further stipulate that a thing is like a thing if it is a thing and the things it is like are b7e8fd5c8
