Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) has become a significant pathogen in children in recent years. The diagnosis of MRSA infection is difficult in children because of the difficulty in making an accurate diagnosis and because of the multiple known risk factors for MRSA colonization and infection. Therapy of MRSA infections in children can be difficult because of the lack of data on standard treatments and the lack of established regimens for pediatric patients. Patients hospitalized with skin and soft tissue infections or bloodstream infections are at greatest risk of MRSA infection. Risk factors for MRSA skin and soft tissue infections include invasive procedures, particularly intravascular catheter placement, and prior exposure to MRSA. Risk factors for MRSA bloodstream infections include skin and soft tissue infections, previous invasive procedures and colonization with MRSA, MRSA colonization of siblings and other household contacts, high-risk diagnoses, and the presence of chronic wounds or a prosthetic device. Antibiotic therapy for MRSA infections in children should be considered as the definite treatment. Therapies with single antibacterial agents should be considered in children with mild disease and low bacterial burden. Antibiotic therapy with oral agents in a combination therapy is considered for mild MRSA infections. Treatment of MRSA infections in children should be initiated with a beta-lactam antibiotic, with aminoglycosides reserved for those cases in which a beta-lactam is contraindicated. Treatment of MRSA infections must include therapy with a vancomycin-containing regimen, although the duration of therapy has not been established. Regular surveillance cultures to identify MRSA colonization of siblings, household contacts, and other risk contacts should be performed on children identified with MRSA infections to guide subsequent therapy. The purpose of this study is to determine the overall effects of hypocaloric intake (50% of resting metabolic rate) in combination with exercise on body composition, resting metabolic rate e79caf774b
