The operating system works properly with all versions of windows, which include bits. The present invention relates to machines which produce or rip formed skin layers from the outsides of flexible sheet material. The invention can be used in conjunction with cut and sew garment manufacturing and production, but is particularly useful in conjunction with the fabrication of sandal like devices that are sewn on the sock of an athletic shoe. Currently a woman can purchase a pair of fashionable shoes from the shoe store that will see her through several year of wear. However, the sole or sock of the shoe is replaced each time the shoe is worn, and this requires a new pair of shoes. The sock is replaced each time because the sock is the main unit of material from which the sock is produced. Thus, the sole of a shoe in which the sock is the sole of the shoe is worn out. This results in a loss of money for the shoe store and a waste of resources for the consumer. In order to avoid the expense of replacing the entire sole of the shoe, or the sock within the sole of the shoe, it has been proposed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,898,085 to eliminate the use of shoes and socks, and produce a comfortable, durable, garment for a foot that can be worn by a variety of individuals, and which can be worn for several hours of wear or several days of wear. The sandal-like device of this patent is made from a sock having a stitching line extending across the sole of the shoe from heel to toe. An elastic member is bonded to the bottom surface of the sole of the sock at the stitching line. A partial cutout is made in the sock to enable the user's foot to easily fit into the sock. The stitching line is located at the bottom surface of the sock and the elastic member extends from the stitching line to the cutout. A thin leather material overlays the bottom surface of the sock in the area between the stitching line and the cutout. This thin leather material
