I. Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to a physical vapor deposition process and device, and, more particularly, to an apparatus and process for producing high quality dielectric films on substrates. II. Description of the Related Art Physical vapor deposition (PVD) processes and devices for producing high quality dielectric films are known and have been available for a number of years. For example, a variety of PVD processes and devices are used commercially to deposit films of various metals and metal alloys, metal nitrides, and metal oxides. Unfortunately, however, known processes and devices for producing high quality dielectric films have been ill-suited for producing films with submicron feature sizes. [Early assessment of learning in a group-centered course]. One basic problem in education and learning is the difficulty that learners must have in applying what they have learnt. Assessment should therefore reflect the appropriate educational process (advancement) of learning and not only the end result, i.e. the final knowledge. This paper presents a quantitative and qualitative analysis of the learning outcome in a course at the Nursing School of the Faculty of Health Science of the E.E.R. in Hamburg. On the basis of a self-assessment, the learning outcome is measured quantitatively. A questionnaire comprising 52 questions is answered by the participants after the end of the course. For the qualitative analysis, a study of both the written evaluation and the recorded conversations with the participants is carried out. Participants' attitudes are investigated in terms of the frequency of a set of 10 applied statements in the written evaluations and of a profile of 10 statements in the recorded conversations. The statements are clustered in terms of a semantic similarity by means of the SIMCA program. The discussion points and methodological aspects are then also taken into account in order to identify problem areas that could be improved on to achieve a higher-level assessment of the learning outcome.
