Endophthalmitis caused by nontuberculous mycobacteria. To report 2 cases of endophthalmitis caused by nontuberculous mycobacteria (NTM) species. Interventional case report. Two patients, 1 with NTM-related lymphadenitis and 1 with NTM-related pneumonia, presented with acute, painless loss of vision in 1 eye. Their medical history was notable for intravenous drug use and allergy to antimicrobial agents. On examination, the right eye of the first patient had a relative afferent pupillary defect, phthisis bulbi, corneal edema, and moderate subconjunctival and anterior chamber reaction. The conjunctiva of the left eye of this patient was congested. The left eye of the second patient showed an afferent pupillary defect and hypopyon. In contrast to other causes of endophthalmitis, visual acuity of both patients remained limited to light perception. Cultures of all anterior segment specimens and vitreous aspirates of both patients grew NTM species. The drug history of both patients suggested that injection of contaminated substances into the anterior chamber of the eye could have been the source of the NTM endophthalmitis. In both patients, a course of combination antimicrobial therapy led to improvement in the condition of the eye.

Endophthalmitis should be suspected in patients with a negative ocular history who present with symptoms of acute visual loss and have NTM recovered from clinical specimens. Therapy with broad-spectrum antimicrobial agents may be needed in the treatment of patients with this condition.
