Early invasive hemodynamic and radiologic studies in patients with left ventricular assist device implantation. This study evaluated the early effects of left ventricular assist device

(LVAD) implantation on hemodynamics and pulmonary and coronary conditions by use of invasive and noninvasive methods. Serial measurements of LVAD flow, intrathoracic blood volume, and regional and systemic hemodynamics were recorded in 12 patients who underwent LVAD implantation. Six patients had a HeartMate left-ventricular assist device, and the other 6 patients had the Biomedicus percutaneous left-ventricular assist device. Hemodynamic and radiologic changes correlated with the duration of LVAD support. Pulmonary arterial pressure decreased in all patients. Free pulmonary vascular resistance also decreased as LVAD support became longer. Intrathoracic blood volume tended to increase with LVAD support. Mean arterial pressure showed little change. However, cardiac index increased significantly with LVAD support. LVAD unloading increased diastolic aortic pressure and decreased central venous pressure. A decrease in right ventricular afterload was suggested by an increase in arteriovenous oxygen difference during LVAD support. These hemodynamic and radiologic changes due to LVAD unloading were evident immediately after operation. Radiologic changes were more significant than the changes in hemodynamics. Early hemodynamic and radiologic studies are useful to predict the outcomes of LVAD implantation.

During an analysis of pond water we discovered the presence of four other terpenoids of the same molecular formula as pitipeptolactone (8). The structures of these compounds, which we call pitipeptolactone derivatives, were confirmed by 1D and 2D NMR analyses, and by comparison with authentic samples of pitipeptolactone. The four new compounds were found in the water sample following the extraction procedure previously reported for the isolation of pitipeptolactone, suggesting that pitipeptolactone derivatives are natural metabolites of pitipeptolactone. The four compounds were quantified by high-resolution mass spectrometry (HRMS), and three of them were also quantified by HPLC with UV detection, showing that they are quite abundant in the sample. The pitipeptolactone derivatives were found to be present in pond water in concentrations ranging from 50 to 90 µg/L, with the lowest concentration being that of 3-methoxy-3-methyl-7-propylisoindole-1,2-dione.
