Denno waveforms at an individual hearing aid gain setting. Current hearing aid gain settings are determined by binaural-loudness matching. The present study evaluated whether matching was accomplished and appropriate for an individual at each gain setting. Forty subjects wore in-ear hearing aids, free of fit-related complications, for 1-2 weeks. The subjects generated a Denno waveform for monoaural and binaural stimulation with each hearing aid gain setting at -25, -15, and -5 dB HL. The Denno's were then decomposed into as little as 5 separate level curves. The level of any one curve contributing to a composite-curve Denno was estimated by regression. Two subjects exhibited persistent clicks in their impedance-measurement curves; the prevalence of these clicks was much higher in one ear than the other. Post-fitting gain setting discrepancies did not significantly differ between the ears of the other 38 subjects. Linear regression estimated that a typical subject would have Denno waveforms that consist of from 13 to 17 distinct level curves at a hearing aid gain setting of -5 dB HL, from 11 to 17 for a setting of -15 dB HL, and from 9 to 17 for a setting of -25 dB HL. The differences in the mean number of level curves that make up the Denno waveform at different gain settings are small enough to justify the traditional practice of fitting for binaural loudness and reporting the gain setting at which the loudness match is achieved. Basically, once a week I post a list and the idea is for you to write a top ten list about whatever topic you want. This week's topic is My Top Ten Book Covers of 2014. I'd actually like to do one of these each week, so I'll update this list once a week and add it to my running TTT lists. 1. The Hunger Games by
