The proportion of people without health insurance has risen from 7% of the population in 2000 to 12% today, and most of those without insurance are likely to be children, the elderly, and single women. Meanwhile, the number of people who are covered by government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid has remained relatively constant at about 60 million people. There is widespread support for the program known as Medicare, and most people are satisfied with the government's health care programs. However, there is little support for raising taxes to fund health care, and many people are suspicious of what they see as the government's intrusion into their private lives. Political Support Public attitudes toward government health care changed dramatically during the 1990s. While most people supported public health care before the 1990s, by 1996 opinion was evenly divided. A majority, 56%, now support providing health insurance through the government, compared with just 29% in 1996 (see "Public's Views on Health Care", 1993-2013). In addition, support for public health care approaches record highs among Democrats, Republicans, and Independents. Nearly 8-in-10 Democrats (78%) favor providing health insurance through the government, up from 38% in 1993
