"So far we have not found adequate answers to the question of why these extremist individuals who have been found in foreign countries with the intention to fight the government and citizens here have chosen soft targets here in Indonesia," Retno Marsudi said on Friday. "It's not a battle that we can take on alone," she said, adding that she was not referring to the fight against Islamic State in the Middle East and Africa. Asked about the possibility of a "safe passage" agreement between Indonesia and some Southeast Asian nations aimed at making it easier for the region's migrants to reach Europe, she said "everyone is a soft target". Tensions run high across Indonesia after the jailbreak of foreign militants on the resort island of Bali, which led to the destruction of two places of worship and to the death of 20 foreigners. Indonesia, the most populous Muslim nation, in recent years has been caught up in a series of bloody attacks, notably on the resort island of Bali, in which 202 people died, and on the southern island of Sulawesi, where nearly two-thirds of the dead were killed. More recently, a suicide bombing on police outside the capital Jakarta was claimed by the Islamic State group, a statement which
