The speed with which synthetic gene circuits can be built, however, is hamstrung by limitations on the speed and reproducibility of DNA synthesis. We present a new technique, which we name Synthetic Gene Array (SyGArray), for cloning DNA with multiple DNA fragments into a single plasmid. This can significantly increase the efficiency of DNA synthesis. We show that SyGArray can be used to clone and express double-stranded DNA targets of up to 16.1 kb in length, and construct synthetic gene networks based on multiple double-stranded DNA fragments. Synthetic gene networks of this size are important for the study of fundamental cellular processes. They can be used to study regulatory circuits, circuits integrating multiple inputs, circuits that couple a nucleic acid sequence to gene expression, and others. The ability to accurately and efficiently clone and express multiple DNA fragments is thus integral to the nascent field of synthetic biology. Here we present the theory and demonstration of the methodology. pubmed notes Laboratory of Synthetic and Cellular Microbiology, New England Biolabs Inc. ↑The DNA synthesis rate was limited by the amount of DNA template in the reaction. Four fragments of double stranded DNA were sub-cloned sequentially into the vector to a total of 14.6 kb. In order to ensure that the steady state transcription level of the synthetic gene network is balanced, we added a mCherry cassette as a negative control. In the absence of positive transcription factors, the experimental strain's mCherry output (in arbitrary fluorescence units) was constant over a 6-hour time course, and most of the mCherry signal decreased over time. For example, in the first experiment, the mCherry output did not show a major decrease over the first 4 e79caf774b
