Q: Template specialization of an abstract class template member template I would like to write a class template that consists of an abstract member template. This member template has one more template parameter but a different, yet specializable base class as follows: template class A< class MyTemplate: public A { public: typedef typename A::MyType MyType; MyType Bar(T& x) [... ] }; I would then want to specialize this class template for a specific subclass: template class A< class MyTemplate: public A { public: typedef typename A::MyType MyType; MyType Bar(T& x) [... ] }; However, this does not work. Is there any way to use a subclass specialization without introducing an A as a base class in MyTemplate? A: You can use an incomplete type (declaring the body first) and forward the call (this is effectively an additional parameter). // incomplete type template class A< struct AImpl; // body template class A< struct AImpl { typedef typename A::MyType MyType; MyType Bar(T& x) [... ] }; Temperature dependent activity of hepatitis C virus NS5B protein.
