NEON (Nirmal Electronics.It's said that arrogance is getting a bad rap nowadays. That it's more of a quality that people should strive to eliminate than the other way around. But a recent study by psychologists suggests that this perception may be a bit off-base. Arrogance actually may benefit you more than it hurts. In a new research study published in Personality and Social Psychology Review, researchers found that people were more likely to have higher levels of arrogance when their abilities were threatened. In other words, those who had more confidence when people told them they were less skilled were actually better at playing the “I’m smart, so I deserve it” game. When faced with that kind of challenge, those who were more self-confident were more likely to see themselves as being superior to others. And that was good for their psychological health, according to the study. “What is surprising is that people who are on the opinion that they are smart, can be more arrogant in the face of evidence to the contrary,” says study author Lillian Konijnendijk, a professor of psychology at the University of Amsterdam. She and her colleagues theorized that people who are good at hiding their emotions tend to become more comfortable in times of adversity. “When the environment is not so nice, we tend to suppress our feelings and use reasoning to make other people understand our point of view,” she says. “When it’s not as easy to think logically, it’s better to think of yourself as better than others.” Study participants were given a brief IQ test, after which they were assigned to one of four groups. They were asked how confident they were of their knowledge, and then given four different statements to answer, some of which were true and others of which were false. In one group, the researchers told the participants that the majority of their peers had actually scored higher on the IQ test. In another, they said that only a small minority of their peers performed significantly better. In a final group, participants were told that their fellow study participants were equally likely to do well on the e79caf774b
