What is the source of the reason that all exceptions must be caught in java? Is this a relatively recent change? Is it because in java a lot of code is not designed to be thread safe, e.g. FileInputStream? A: In short, it's a Java language design decision. You can read up on what they had in mind in the original thread on this issue. By the way, there are exceptions which must be caught, such as the RuntimeException being thrown by the native close() function which you don't want to miss at any cost. A concrete example of this kind of exception is the SecurityException (or its subclasses) when a security manager is enabled in the JVM. It's also possible to catch certain kinds of exceptions and rethrow them (at a great cost in execution time). A: Funny you should mention that. That's why the discussion on how to change that rule is so important. This question is surprisingly little known: the exception default behavior in Java is a Java language design decision, not an underlying VM language specification. There was a rule that checked for unrecoverable errors (as defined in Java Language Specification, section 5.6), and required you to catch them, or your code would run at the mercy of Java's JVM's JVMError handling. Exception chaining (§9.6) is intended to preserve the ability to handle any and all exceptions, for applications that might be able to do so. That meant that Java language designers had to both include the ability to handle any exception or to interpose the call stack at a chance to handle it, and they had to make a decision about what one should do in what circumstances (should you log an exception, or should you attempt recovery, or should you kill the app? Should you crash on a corrupt file, or on a malformed file? Are you supposed to prevent reading from a broken file? And so on). The conclusion of the Java language designers was
