Collaborative, Rich Platform, Social Games. Program in Lua Roblox's programming language is based on the Lua programming language, which was developed by Roberto Ierusalimschy and is supported by the Lua development team, based in Japan. Roblox also uses the Lua programming language for many third party libraries and modules, including their core libraries. Unlike many other video game platforms, Roblox typically does not provide tools to modify software or hardware. Other software tools can be found on the Roblox website.

Instead, users, developers, and programmers are encouraged to use Roblox Studio to develop and program games. Roblox also allows users to monetize their games with in-game purchases. History Early history

Developer Erik Cassel and high school student David Baszucki created Roblox in 2004.[2] They named the platform Roblox because the two of them thought it sounded fun to type when trying to spell the word "robot".[1] The app was first released on December 21, 2006 and was still in beta when it launched on the iTunes App Store on December 25, 2006.[2] Roblox's first version did not use Lua, instead it was written in Visual Basic and they used a text-based, console-style window. It had a 10,000 limit on user accounts and 300 slots for apps.[3]

Growth During the 2010s, Roblox grew rapidly into a popular online game platform. The platform had launched its first mobile app, and Roblox Studio was released to the public. The Roblox Studio was a programming tool that allowed users to create apps for Roblox, including games. Up until May 2017, the only way to monetize games was through in-game purchases. In May 2017, the developer team released the first version of a free-to-play app to further monetize the platform. Since then, it has been free to play and has remained that way. On August 27, 2018, the company began a change that would let users add more than one type of currency for the first time. In 2012, Roblox Corporation broke the 10,000,000 user record for a website or app. According to the company, the company saw a surge in new user signups in 2010 and more in 2011. The 2012

signups were reported to be due to iOS 7's new ad platform.[4]
