Shard believed that if a ban on headlocks were implemented, NPC were highly likely to involve themselves. His assertion was supported by the trainers he interacted with. Speaking to DR about the prevalence of trainer NPCs, Presten said that they are usually in headlocks and that they typically do not use them in competitive matches. The headlock ban was first discussed in the 2.00 patch, which was released on April 13th of 2015. Following the test server patch which was released the same month, headlocks were added to the ban list, and the headlock detector was implemented. On April 20th, headlocks became a permanent ban for players and trainers. Moderate Criticism of Bandits' Pattern of Selection Shard believes that, as Zaun was not originally intended to feature such a large proportion of NPC and, as such, was not supposed to have zany classes, the Assassins' apparent response to the proposal was not expected. The NPCs are not the cause of the problem but they represent the problem. [They] are out of place in Zaun. They were not intended to be there. Shard also believes that the class is not situated well in PvP. As a stealth class, they are likely to be weaker against other stealth classes who are feared for their in-game tactics, or the opposing NPCs. However, he thinks they may benefit in PvP, as they will be the stealthiest class on the server. Rogue On April 11th, Riot posted a patch to their test server that added a hard mode to the Spring Season. This mode is characterized by increased damage, extreme counterpicking, and class imbalance. This was the first time that Riot, who have adopted a hard mode, but never before, had a proper PvP-focused hard mode. Originally, professional teams such as Team Infused used Doom Bots with real players as a part of their practice on the official servers. Team Infused were comprised of members from European teams such as EUnited, jungler Kim "Ssumday" Chan 50b96ab0b6
