Abnormal elevation of the zeta potential induced by cationic surfactant in a cationic reverse micellar system. A cationic surfactant, N-alkyl-N,N-dimethylpyrrolidinium bromide (PDMBr), was added to a reverse micellar (RM) system composed of a cationic surfactant, N,N-dimethyl pyrrolidinium bromide (PDMBr), with a sodium salt such as sodium dodecyl sulfate (SDS), potassium salts or ammonium salts, in order to investigate the effect of the cationic surfactant on the electrostatic properties of the RM systems.

The RM systems show the typical decrease in the critical micellar concentration, cmc, upon addition of the PDMBr to the SDS/KBr or K₂SO₄/KBr system. The zeta potential value of the RM system exhibits a tendency to decrease as the ratio of PDMBr to SDS increases. However, the zeta potential value of the system with addition of PDMBr did not decrease to zero at the cmc, but rather increased above the zeta potential value of the ionic surfactant system. This shows that in the RM system, an excess of the cationic surfactant induces not only an increase in the number of cationic surfactant molecules encapsulated in the RM, but also an increase in the hydration layer thickness of the cationic surfactant, resulting in a significant increase in the dipole moment of the cationic surfactant molecules. As a result, the charge repulsion between cationic surfactant molecules becomes so strong that the aggregates of the cationic surfactant in the presence of excess cationic surfactant are transformed into rigid, non-interacting molecules, as shown by transmission electron microscopy. In addition, these rigid aggregates can be observed by small-angle neutron scattering. Close-ups on Global Warming Published July 30, 2006 As the consequences of global warming become clearer, the plight of man-made regions such as Sardinia's once lush and fertile mountainsides is being added to the list of those most imperiled. In this region of
