"It is a very long time since I have started my career at the top of tennis and it is a long, long road ahead of me," said Federer on Australian television. "I've been in the top three for the last five or six years and it's going to take time to come to a level I want. "But you never know, I might be able to make it happen this year," he added. This study tested the hypotheses that active walking, when compared to passive walking, improves balance and mobility. Fifty-eight adults (mean age, 48+/-18 yr) with chronic low back pain were randomly assigned to either an active or a passive walking group. Fourteen different balance and mobility tests were administered before and after the 8-wk study. During the walking protocol, participants walked (6 m) at a comfortable speed. Results indicate that the balance and mobility measures were improved following the active walking intervention. The differences were found for all primary outcome measures, and statistically significant improvements were reported for almost all tests. These results support the inclusion of active stepping in rehabilitation programs for persons with low back pain.Q: Why the model provided by the website is not passing validation in Rails? I have seen how to test a Rails model in model_test.rb and create a functional test in functional_test.rb. Now there is a challenge that I want to test the validation on a model. I have created a model called Post.rb in my Rails project for my test. And I have used rails g model post title:string body:text tags:text Now in the model test file, I have written some code and tested the model. It works fine. But the error in the validation is not captured. And when I added the logging in the model_test.rb it shows as WARN: app/models/post.rb:1:in ``: uninitialized constant Test::Unit::TestCase (NameError) But if I run the same code in a console, I am getting the error. So, the Test::Unit::TestCase is not getting loaded? Is there any way I can fix this? A: You have to run the tests in the order of creation of the files. Your Test::Unit::TestCase is loaded before the model. If you created those files, in the order Post.rb -> post_test.rb -> post_model.rb you have to run the test in the order model.rb -> post_test.rb -> post 6d1f23a050
