Colors are present in the rainbow, but not exactly in the same way they are in the rainbow. This is possibly the reason why the definitions of colors change and differ from one another. However, a study of a liquid metal in water shows that it is possible to make color studies of the liquid metal by simple methods. Each color, as red, green, blue, etc. has a composition of white, black, yellow, etc. and vice versa. It is possible to make a study of the color of a liquid metal and the composition of the constituent parts of the rainbow by making a study of the color-change in the liquid metal as a function of time. In this manner a study could be made of the color of a liquid metal droplet of a particular shape and size. This study was made by Artjukse et al., [1] on a liquid metal droplet of one square centimeter in the container for the time period of ten hours. The liquid metal droplet is a very unusual shape for a liquid metal in terms of the aspect ratio, which describes the shape of the droplet as the ratio of the length of the diagonal of the droplet compared to the length of the edge of the liquid metal droplet. For many liquids the aspect ratio is equal to one. Hence, in the aspect ratio of the liquid metal droplet, a value of almost two was achieved. The aspect ratio of the droplet was a function of the force used to create a droplet in the container and the height of the fluid. A negative force works to make the droplet taller while a positive force works to make the droplet shorter. Thus, the aspect ratio of the droplet in this study depended on the height of the fluid. When the droplet was under vacuum conditions, the color of the droplet was a distinct green color. When the vacuum was removed and the liquid was in a water environment, the color changed. This became black to red in color. When the liquid was put in a container, the droplet became even blacker because the contact area of the liquid with the liquid metal droplet became larger
