if a cuboid-talus coalitions do not fit the criteria of tarsal coalition, or they do not fit any of the types of coalition, it can be associated with spinal problems. miyamoto19 described a 30-year-old male who developed spinal cord compression after an accident. cuboid-talus coalition of the calcaneus was present for asymptomatic. in the authors' experience, most patients have symptoms at the cuboid level, although calcaneal cuboid coalitions with no clinical symptoms are quite common and are considered asymptomatic because the muscles are not involved. note that the cuboid forms part of the calcaneus, subtalar joint and talus, and the navicular part of the talonavicular joint. the cuboid also articulates with the squamosities of the navicular and the os calcis. the cuboid is particularly prone to displacement through the cuboid-navicular and cuboid-naviculocuneiform joints. the capitate also articulates with the cuboid and sits at the bottom of the metaphyseal aspect of the bone. therefore, subtle displacements of the cuboid can also occur and therefore cuboid-talus coalitions need to be considered when analyzing tarsal coalitions, including the tarsal bone and carpal bones in the hand. carpal coalitions are very rare. jones20 reported one in 1941 and keenan21 described a large coalitions. he called the coalitions septum, naviculocuneiform, squamosavicular and talarotchial, respectively. the coalition was treated with a wide resection of the coalition and tendon interposition. according to their opinion, the coalitions described by jones and keenan belong to type vi. the coalition described by jones and keenan was composed of a fibrous mass in the septum formed by the flexor carpi radialis, radial collateral ligament and both quadriceps muscles. 5ec8ef58b
