In the not so distant past, if you wanted to edit a photograph, you'd use an image editing software package, like PS Elements. Smartphone cameras were not the highest resolution cameras and unless you had an HD television to display your capture, that was pretty much the highest you could hope for. In today's world of smartphones, there's something kind of magical that can happen when you connect your iPhone's camera to Adobe Camera Raw and still crop a photo to 1080p HD. AI and machine vision continues to play a role in the future of Photoshop. The company has a lot of expertise in face recognition technology, and they're continuing to try to refine it along with the rest of the AI technologies in the pipeline. We were able to test a couple of features in the app, resulting in a few interesting finds. For starters, we tried to create a portrait of our editor talking into a wireless mic. AI picked out the guy in the background on the wall and added a uniform gray area to fill the rest of the background. That's pretty impressive -- but for some reason, we found it even better when the background was a textured wallpaper. If Photoshop could look at textured wallpaper and pick out the red stripes, that's something we'd all be interested in. The contents of the CD cover need to be transferred to the CD cover image in the most elegant way. Normally, you should delete all the funny stuff first (compartment, signature, logo, etc.), then resize/recrop to the cover. For the photos in the CD cover, you have to select all the photos, then delete the background and duplicates, and save the selected images with transparent background as CD covers.
